Not illustrated. 1893 Excerpt: . . . observed, and in particular would have given rise to a distinct exophthalmos. A case very closely analogous to that here described has been published by Professor Sgrosso, of Naples. In his case, however, the cysticercus was not discovered complete, but only the hooklets, while another point of difference between the two was the presence of pus in the one (Sgrossos) and not in the other. Meyer concludes his paper with a brief reference to the question, already much discussed, as to whether the cysticercus produces its inflammatory effect by means of infectious germs which find an entrance with it, or by the irritating chemical action of the substances which it secretes. He adheres to the latter view, at least in the present case, and remarks in passing, that in his opinion the inflammation resulting from intra-ocular cysticercus is generally set up in this way. N. M. ML. Leopold Weiss (Heidelberg). The Diagnosis of Sympathetic Ophthalmia. Archives of Ophth. , xxii. i. At the last meeting of the Ophthalmological Congress at Heidelberg, the question of the difficulty of deciding whether an inflammation occurring in the second eye some time after the other had been injured was or was not a true sympathetic ophthalmia, came up for discussion. The subject is one of great practical importance, more especially in its obvious bearing on the claims of the injured person to accident insurance. The following is a case in point: --H. E. , aged 28, boiler maker, was on...
